AN OSTRICH FARM. -Ostrich farming is almost a new feature among the industries of South Africa, and is yet in its infancy. There for Cleaning your House will save the labor of are many different modes of procedure adopt-one cleaner. Give it a trial. ed; all, of course, with the same object, that of keeping up the numbers of this valuable bird, which has been hunted so persistently for the sake of its feathers, that there are now no wild birds south of the Vaal river. Graham's Town (which is a most agreeable place and delightfully situated in the eastern province) has in its neighborhood several ostrich farmers, some of whom are very successful. It is found necessary to confine the birds in inclosures large enough for them to obtain their own food (consisting of grass and various kinds of herbage). just as if they were in a state of nature. If they are kept in smaller paddocks they must be supplied with food by artificial means. A stone wall, three or four feet thick, will generally keep them in. Some farmers have adopted an incubator, and by its means they have raised a considerable number of young birds, which at the end of a month are worth £10 each. Othersallow the birds to hatch their own eggs. The feathers, which are plucked in a narrow pen, into which the birds are entired one by one, vary in quality and price, according to the age of the birds and the portion of the body from which they are plucked, some of the best being worth £45 per able. Cheaper than Soap.

The farming of the ostrich, if well and carefully conducted upon a suitable farm, with the necessary enclosures and plenty of food, is found to be very profitable; and it is now becoming quite a common thing among the sheep farmers to keep ostriches as well as sheep; but the birds are easily injured-a slight blow from a stone or stick will break their legs, in which case the bird inevitably dies. The cock birds, whose plumage is black and white, are often exceedingly fierce, especially at or after pairing season, when it is dangerous for a man on foot to approach them, as they will at once give chase. When they overtake the fugitive they knock him down with their foot, as a man would with his fist, and strike and trample their victim on the ground, often inflicting very serious injuries.
